Ex-circus owner an expert on foreign labor

BY MICA ROSENBERG AND MEGAN TWOHEY REUTERS

COVINGTON, Virginia — It was after midnight last spring when a bus dropped road-weary Mexican workers outside this city of 6,000 people.

They had cleared customs, crossed the U.S. border, and spent parts of three nights in the bus before arriving at their new home for the next six months: a traveling carnival called Cole Shows Amusement Compa-

No matter how many hours they worked, each would earn $316.22 a week after taxes for assembling the rides, tearing them down and doing anything else to keep the show on the road.

Their new boss, R.C. Cole, greeted the workers and ushered them to the windowless trailers with narrow, 6-foot-long rooms their living quarters for the coming months.

"Is there a bulb in there," Cole asked in a gravelly drawl, futilely flipping a switch in one of the rooms. "No? We'll need to get a new bulb over here.

Cole could handle the trailer repairs. But he and more than 150 other carnival owners and concessioners across the nation have come to rely on a specialist to find the workers and get them the visas they need to work in the United States.

Enter James Judkins, a man familiar with the needs of a traveling show. A former circus owner who once performed as a fire-eater and juggler, Judkins has emerged as the largest purveyor of Mexican workers for the $500 million-a-year carnival industry. He is among a growing number of brokers who have become experts in securing visas and helping U.S. companies find cheap foreign labor.

The visas allow hundreds of thousands of workers from Mexico and other nations to come to the United States for months or years at a time and then return to their home countries. Democrats and Republicans alike see them as a welcome alternative to undocumented workers. Businesses owned by Republican presidential frontrunner Donald Trump are among those that have hired foreign workers for temporary jobs.

But critics contend that the visas programs, especially the one used by carnivals, leave workers vulnerable to exploitation. Under the H2B visa program, employers are allowed to hire foreign workers for lowskill, seasonal jobs that Americans don't want. Government oversight is minimal.

Judkins, 58, teamed with a former circus colleague in shop" for employers looking to use foreign workers on H2B visas. Not only does he recruit the workers, but Judkins also navigates the visa process and arranges for their transportation to the job sites. He charges the carnivals $300 per worker, Judkins said.

Supplying inexpensive labor has become especially critical to sustain the carnival industry, a part of Americana since the Ferris wheel was introduced at the 1893 World's Fair in Chicago

Juggling act

"American employers need these workers," Judkins said, "and the workers need these jobs.'

Since he launched JKJ Workforce in 2003, business has boomed. In his first year, Judkins gained U.S. government approval to bring about 100 workers into the country. This year, Judkins or those who work for him secured approval to bring in almost 4,000 Mexican workers, according to U.S. Department of Labor data. That would make him responsible for more than half of the foreign workers who handle the rides, booths and other concessions at America's traveling carni-

The role requires Judkins to draw on a different sort of juggling skills than those he Mexico to create what his learned during his decades genial, he lobbies lawmakers on labor issues. He organizes convoys of buses to get workers through crime-ridden parts of Mexico and into the United States. He also troubleshoots problems that inevitably surface after workers arrive in America.

In recent months, Judkins said, he arranged for the body of a worker who committed suicide during the spring to be sent back to Mexico, and he helped one jailed worker find a lawyer. Judkins said only that the man was accused of sexually abusing a carnival patron, pleaded guilty to a lesser charge and was released.

His company also is a subject of complaints filed in 2014 with the National Labor Relations Board. The charges, which Judkins disputes, allege that he illegally created a union to keep wages low for the Mexican carnival workers.

To attend an annual festival for the returning workers, Judkins traveled last week to the Mexican city of Tlapacoyan. That's where partner Victor Apolinar, 48, recruits the workers who Judkins then matches with his clients. The relationship provides inexpensive labor for the carnival industry and opportunities for residents of the city of almost 60,000 about 300 km east of Mexico City. Work in the nearby citrus and banana about a quarter of what's offered by the carnivals.

Judkins and Apolinar often rely on past workers to vouch for new hires.

"In the beginning, when I was given the opportunity, I went to contact people at their homes to ask if they wanted to go to the U.S.,' Apolinar said as he sipped hot chocolate outside the church in Tlapacoyan's town square earlier this year. "They began to see that it was beneficial to their families and started to say, 'Look here, I have a brother, I have a friend who also wants to go.' And that's how the network grew."

The network has served him well. In 2013, so great was Apolinar's popularity that he was elected mayor of Tlapacoyan.

Complaints and concerns

The second oldest of 10 siblings, Apolinar says he understands the predicament that many in his native Tlapacoyan face. Apolinar recalled how, as a teenager, he was hungry for job opportunities in America. Seasonal work at a circus provided a ticket across the

There he met Judkins, who had been working circuses since college. Apolinar soon picked up the nickname "Pony" for handling the pony ride.

When Judkins started a

Judkins and Apolinar say the carnival workers they recruit pay only the cost of visa processing and transportation to the United States, around $300, as legally permitted, and that certain carnival employers reimburse these fees. They say they have never charged workers for the jobs themselves, a violation of American law, and many workers attest to that.

Some workers, however, offer less-than-glowing reviews of their experience. Because Judkins and Apolinar have plenty of applicants to choose from, workers say it's difficult to complain about working conditions without fear to being blacklisted. Workdays can last for 20 hours, and after they arrive in the United States, workers have few options but to do as they are

'You can't say anything because if you do, the recruiter will say, 'You cause a lot of conflict, you won't be going back'," said Jorge Garcia, who worked for eight seasons at carnivals. Garcia is among a group
