Miller on his 'Dark Knight Returns': 'I was rooting for Batman'

BY DAVID BETANCOURT WASHINGTON POST

It was "devastating," Frank Miller says. That is how the comics legend describes, with intentional hyperbolic flair, the event that helped him script and draw one of the greatest Batman tales ever told.

So you've got our attention, Mr. Miller. What was it that helped guide you to create "The Dark Knight Re-

Three decades ago, when he was 29, Miller says he was attempting to tell a type of Batman story that hadn't been seen before. Sure, he was nervous about bringing "The Dark Knight Returns" to fruition, but what bothered him more was his upcoming birthday.

To me, [turning 30] was becoming an ancient. Batman had to absolutely be older than I was," Miller says. "Now, we all know Batman is eternally 29 [in the comics]. So I had to do something about it."

So Miller created his vi-Knight with battle scars and little patience for those who stood in his way. That version, of course, remains just as popular today as any current version of Batman.

"I made him as old as I could conceivably imagine a man could be," says Miller, explaining why he chose age 50. "And by doing that, I made him older than me. I made him a lot crankier, and was able to move him through time into a world that much more resembled the world that I lived in, in 1986 in New York City.

at the same time. And I thought I was making him old and cranky. But I didn't learn what old and cranky was until I hit 50." Now, DC Comics is celebrating the 30th anniversary of "The Dark Knight Refurther with the violence Miller recalls. "An idea of turns" with a special comsion of Batman: older, memorative edition. As he wiser, edgier, a Dark marks the milestone himself, Miller can still remember the nerves he felt when creating the story's concept and presenting it to people at DC, who at that time had a different mindset as to what Batman was and represented.

The two most important authorities at DC in the mid-1980s, Miller says, were Paul Levitz and Jenette Kahn — both of whom "Dark supported his Knight Returns" vision, he notes. It was the "lower-tier" people at DC that weren't as supportive, says Miller, explaining that many times, his edi-"I was updating the tor would tell him: "Jencharacter and aging him ette and Paul will never at the same time. And I approve this." But those at the top continually told Miller to keep going.

'Jenette and Paul were the ones that did approve it, and enthusiastically, and encouraged me to go in it," Miller recounts. "It was the [other] people on the staff that resisted it, because I was playing with their childhood.

And Miller's alterations to the Bat-mythos didn't end with the Caped Crusader. Miller's Robin is one of the more recognizable characters from his Dark Knight story, in part because he took the "boy" out of Boy Wonder and made Robin more than a sidekick. Miller says that the idea to create Carrie Kelley whom the Marylandborn Miller considers Batman's adoptive daughter in "Dark Knight Returns" was sparked by a conversation with comics veteran John Byrne, while the two were flying to an Ohio comics convention.

"I told [Byrne] I had an idea for a Batman book where Batman was older and crankier ... and he said make Robin a girl, and he drew me a sketch,

Robin as a girl, and how the costume would look better on a girl. The idea was so good I couldn't resist it. It just seemed natural from then on.'

One of the memorable enes in "The Dark scenes in Knight Returns" is the fight between the older Batman and Superman; the image of a Batman boot landing on Superman's jaw has stayed with fans for generations.

Miller vividly remembers plotting that famed fight, which inspired next month's "Batman v Superman: Dawn of Justice.

"Oh, yeah — I so much wanted Batman to win, I can't tell you," Miller says. "I wanted the bad boy to win. I wanted the guy who got by just on his brains to take down the superpowered schoolboy. I was rooting for Batman all the way as I was writing and drawing the story. I got to have my guy win.'

And what does Miller think of Ben Affleck, who is bringing Miller's older, angrier Batman to the screen?

"I'll be there in the audience — I can't wait to see it," Miller says. "I hope it's good. I wish [Affleck] well.

Reflecting on the past 30 years, Miller can appreciate just what "The Dark Knight Returns" universe has become at DC, inspiring live-action films, animation and more comicbook tales — including Miller's "Dark Knight III: The Master Race." And he can bask in the fact he got to deliver the Batman story he wanted to tell.

"I just mainly wanted to do my version of Batman and see if I could get it out, and see if anybody liked it," Miller says. "I had no idea what was coming or where it was going to go, and that there'd end up being so many [stories]. It's been a real thrill ride.

LOS ANGELES — D.C.'s National Portrait Gallery, the nation's official home to portraits of U.S. presidents, will add another chief exec to its collection next month that of President Frank Underwood, Kevin Spacey's menacing character on the Netflix series, "House of Cards." The painting by British artist Jonathan Yeo was presented to the gallery on Monday by Spacey and its creator.

The larger-than-life portrait presents the character gazing downward disdainfully at the viewer, an American flag at his side and sharp knuckles at the ready. A surreal quality to the painting is digital image projected on a screen, said Yeo at a press gathering.

The work was officially unveiled at a private event in D.C. that also included Netflix chief content officer Ted Sarandos, gallery director Kim Sajet and members of the White House press aimed at presenting it as a cently hung at London's National Portrait Gallery, while the Darrow portrait is not yet completed.

Per an agreement between the gallery and the artist, the portrait is on loan to the facility while a donor is sought.

Yeo's painting will go on display in late March, but it will not hang alongside the gallery's iconic renderings of actual presidents such as Gilbert Stuart's "Lansdowne" portrait of George Washington. Instead, it will be been given a street-level location near an entrance for expedient viewing by visitors.

Presumably, that will be a better location than the The portrait is actually the museum selected several gifted portrait of then-Comedy Central's Stephen Colbert — on a wall directly
