mother. She loves to cook, and she absolutely loves food, which will come in handy when the time comes for the produce to be picked and used in meals for those using the Bangor Area Recovery Network's services.

“The main reason behind this project is the issue of food insecurity and how much it plagues our entire state. We wanted to do something that would raise awareness about that,” Thiesen said.

The Bangor Area Recovery Network provides recovery resources for people in greater Bangor. It's not affiliated with Alcoholics Anonymous, Narcotics Anonymous or any one particular group, but it does provide rental space for these meetings and other events to do with recovery.

Those addicted to substances are less likely to eat healthy and more likely to be underemployed and ineligible for food assistance, according to the Bangor Area Recovery Network. This particular effort aims to help those who use the Bangor Area Recovery Network's services to learn how to eat healthy and be self-reliant by growing their own food, cooking it and preserving it.

“Growing food here fits in well with recovery and the work they do here. It's about putting healthy things into people's bodies rather than poison. I think a big aspect of recovery is filling that time and space they were filling with using or drinking with something else to do. This will provide that,” Thiesen said.

Bain already has plans for the vegetables that have only just started growing outside the Bangor Area Recovery Network's doors.

“My thought is that we'll do a community dinner every couple weeks. We're trying to figure out how to do it, but we're also hoping to do cooking lessons and teach people how to budget money and how to use what you have,” Bain said. With fall crops, Bain said that soup dinners will be on the menu, supplemented by the leftover rolls Frank's Bake Shop and Catering donates to the Bangor Area Recovery Network.

For Stauff, helping put the beds together was an enjoyable activity, and he hopes the garden will keep people at the Bangor Area Recovery Network busy.

“This here — it's nice. It's good for people. It gives them something to do. It gives me something to do. I mean, I'm retired, if I wasn't doing this I would be planted myself,” Stauff said with a laugh.

Stauff helps out at the Bangor Area Recovery Network as often as he can, and he hopes that the community garden will become a long-lasting resource.

“Who knows, maybe if this gets really good we can talk them into using that section over there,” Stauff said, pointing to another available plot of land on the property.

Stauff understands that those in recovery need to stay busy, but he believes it's about more than just that.

“You have to give back. A lot of people just take. They don't realize that you have to give it away in order to keep it. This is giving it away,” he said.

When formulating the plan for the garden, McKay was careful to consult others in charge of similar projects in the Bangor area, such as horticulturist Kate Garland of the Bangor Community Garden and Pat Bears, who is involved with gardening programs in the Orono community.

“Other people are doing things like this, and we don't to jump in and muck things up,” McKay said.

He ensured that the purpose of these gardens would be different, and that they would foster and benefit the communities they were constructed in.

“To start a project like this you need structure. You need something set up so the work can get done, it's managed well and people don't abandon it,” Thiesen said. “We came to the [Bangor Area Recovery Network] because there is structure. There are people here every day.”

Food AND Medicine also helped build garden beds at Crestwood Place, an assisted living facility in Bangor that also has the structure Thiesen spoke of. Thiesen hopes that these garden beds will last for many years to come — they were constructed with that in mind.

Food AND Medicine also hopes to expand the projects to churches, schools and beyond to help out anyone who might need it, and most importantly, connect with the community.

“We're all about picking people up — giving them opportunities and places and ways to stand up and become empowered and liberated,” McKay said.

UM Sustainable agriculture tour

OLD TOWN — A Sustainable Agriculture Field Day Tour is scheduled 4:30-7 p.m. Thursday, June 30, at University of Maine's Rogers Farm, 914 Bennoch Road. Registration starts at 4 p.m.

The field day will focus on research results and sustainable farming practices of small grains, potatoes, vegetable weed control and risk management for small production farmers. Speakers include research staff and graduate students from UMaine's College of Natural Sciences, Forestry and Agriculture and University of Maine Cooperative Extension specialists.

The event is free; 2.5 certified crop adviser credits and one pesticide credit will be offered. Refreshments will be provided. More information about the event is online. For information or to request a disability accommodation, contact John Jemison at 581-3241 or jemison@maine.edu. Information about sustainable agriculture research at Rogers Farm is at umaine.edu/rogersfarm.
