Lawsuit shutters Gawker.com site

BY PAUL FARHI

THE WASHINGTON POST

Gawker.com, the news site that attracted millions of readers with its insider gossip, scoops, speculation and a writing style that helped shape the voice of the internet, will close next week, the result of a defamation lawsuit filed by one of its targets, pro wrestler Hulk Hogan.

The site said Thursday it was closing 14 years after Nick Denton, a veteran British journalist, founded it in New York and two days after Univision won a bankruptcy its other operations.

auction for its parent company, Gawker Media. It is not clear if Univision, which has not officially taken over the company, was involved in the decision, said a Gawker post.

The Spanish-language television broadcaster agreed to pay $135 million for Gawker.com and its six related websites.

The decision to close the site eliminates any lingering controversy for its would-be new owner, which is awaiting a bankruptcy court's approval of the purchase.

Gawker has said it will reassign its employees to
