Leia's slave costume entices at 'Star Wars' auction

LOS ANGELES — While most “Star Wars” fans are clamoring to get their hands on the newest franchise droid BB-8, deep-pocketed collectors will have a chance to buy original movie memorabilia, such as Princess Leia’s iconic slave costume in an upcoming auction.

More than 50 lots of “Star Wars” props and items owned by those involved with the production of the films will be offered up for sale on Oct. 1 at Profiles in History, the auction house said Wednesday.

A gold metallic bikini worn by actress Carrie Fisher as Princess Leia enslaved by Jabba the Hutt in 1983’s “Return of the Jedi,” is estimated to fetch between $80,000 to $120,000 but could sell for far more.

“It’s every schoolboy’s fantasy, but it’s also a very signature, iconic piece,” Brian Chanes, consignment manager at Profiles in History, said.

George Lucas’ intergalactic “Star Wars” franchise first premiered in 1977 with “Star Wars: Episode IV — A New Hope” and quickly became embedded into American pop culture.

The “Star Wars” sale, which also features cameras used to shoot the movies, scripts, posters and prototype Darth Vader helmets, is likely to whet the appetites of avid fans ahead of the December release of “The Force Awakens,” the seventh film installment.

Toys from the new film were released early this month and have already become hot collector’s items.

“It’s exceedingly difficult to find anything of this nature from the original trilogy,” Chanes said. “These are actually from production, that’s what created history and mythology of ‘Star Wars’ and that’s why it’s so important.”

Another expected top seller is a miniature blockade runner spaceship from 1977’s “A New Hope,” the ship carrying Princess Leia and droids C-3PO and R2-D2.

“People love filming miniatures because it illustrates the magic behind the films,” Chanes said.

spot for recreators, but because of its limited number of parking areas it’s never crowded.

Driving into the preserve on Tennis Road, you’ll notice there are four trailheads, two on each side of the road, as well as two parking areas, two on each side of the road. Refer to the trail map to decide which route you’d like to hike.

On the east side of the road — your left, if driving into the preserve — there are 2 miles of intersecting trails. Key features of this section of the preserve are several stunning views of the ocean, a beautiful small beach, an old cemetery and the foundations of Pickering Farm.

On the west side of the road — your right, if driving into the preserve — there are 1.4 mile of intersecting trails. Key features of this section of the preserve include views along the shore and the foundations of the Davis Farm.

As you visit the foundations of old homesteads and the tombstones of previous landowners, it’s impossible not to think about the land’s history and how it must have appeared quite different just a few decades ago.

Artifacts found on the property indicated that Native Americans camped along the shore for up to 2,000 years, according to the Island Heritage Trust brochure about the preserve. In more recent times, deeds from the 1790s show the land was settled by Elijah Toothaker and his wife, Elizabeth. Their children farmed the land. Later, the Pickering and Davis families farmed there.

Around 1914, the artist Chase Emerson purchased the farmhouse on the shore, according to the Island Heritage Trust. Finally, the Tennis family purchased the property in 1944.

Admission is free, and dogs are permitted if on leash. The land trust asks that visitors stay on trail, respect abutting private property, pick up trash and take nothing from the landscape — take photographs instead. The preserve is open for day use only. Motorized vehicles, mountain bikes, camping and fires are prohibited.

For information, visit islandheritagetrust.org, where a printable trail brochure and map are available, or call the land trust at 348-2455.
