Movie revisits the night Arkansas was almost destroyed

BY STEPHANIE MERRY THE WASHINGTON POST

It didn't take much to nearly annihilate Arkansas. In 1980, a young repairman, who was standing on a platform working on a missile in the town of Damascus, dropped a socket from his wrench. It fell 70 feet, took a bounce and pierced the fuel tank of the missile, which was armed with a nuclear warhead three times more powerful than the bombs that leveled Hiroshima and Nagasaki.

Over the next 10 hours, as the fuel leak created a series of other chemical reactions, the Air Force scrambled to figure out what to do with a ticking time bomb, and the fixes weren't entirely successful. There was a deadly explosion, in the end — it just wasn't a catastrophic one.

er drills were a memory, but the threat of nuclear attack was still very real. Since 1991, those fears of nuclear war with the Russians have disappeared; the bombs, however, haven't.

That's one eye-opening reminder in "Command and Control," a documentary by Robert Kenner based on the book by Eric Schlosser, who's famous for writing "Fast Food Nation.

"There's sort of this amnesia that's washed over all of us to the point where we've stopped being concerned that the planet could end because of a mistake," Kenner said during a recent visit to Washington with Schlosser. "That complacency makes it more dangerous.'

These kinds of near-misses 32 documented ones, but At the time, the United probably many more — are States was still in the thick of called "broken arrows," and because of their frequency and because Americans assume that the greatest threats to our safety will come from afar.

The movie's second thread is a more comprehensive examination of the way the United States kept upping the ante on arming itself during the Cold War. The more weapons we had, the more safe we presumably were except when we weren't. Like the time a plane broke apart over North Carolina and dropped a hydrogen bomb that inadvertently went through nearly all of its steps to detonate. A last-ditch precaution — a part of the bomb that looked a lot like an on-off light switch — prevented catastrophe.

We can blame some of the broken arrows on a culture of secrecy at the time. As an example, during the Cold War, the Cold War. Duck-and-cov- the stories are startling both one of the people in charge of control America's nuclear weapons safety wasn't privy to the accidents that were happening in the field. The good news is, that's changed.

"The warheads and bombs are much safer today than they were in 1980," Schlosser said. "There was such a denial there was a problem, because once you admit there's a problem, you have to admit that all of your weapons are potentially unsafe and that was too much to deal with."

The bad news is, we have new threats that weren't around 35 years ago, like cyberattacks on nuclear command systems.

That sounds like the plot 'WarGames,'" Schlosser admitted. But it's real. If terrorists wanted to do extensive damage, what better way than to get the nuclear codes? In 2012, the National Security Agency acknowledged that the computer systems that weapons are "under constant attack" from hackers.

The point of writing the book and making the movie wasn't to lobby for certain policy changes. Schlosser and Kenner simply want to call attention to the thousands of very powerful bombs stashed around the country in places like the Nevada National Security Site near Las Vegas or the Pantex Plant near Amarillo, Texas. They aren't apocalyptic doomsayers.

'I don't lie in bed at night thinking that a nuclear warhead is going to go off," Schlosser said. "But it's concerning, and it's definitely a problem that can be addressed. The consequences of one weapon going off anywhere is going to be unimaginable.'

The two have a history of spurring change with their work. Schlosser's influential "Fast Food Nation" was the inspiration for Kenner's Oscar-nominated "Food, Inc." Since the book and movie, farmers markets have multiplied and consumers have increasingly rejected processed food, leading even fast-food chains to embrace healthier

They received a lot more pushback on that book and movie than on "Command and Control." When he was gathering research on nukes, Schlosser worried that the government would come knocking. Instead, after the release of his book, he was invited to talk about the issues with people who were running our nuclear weapons complex.

As the United States continues to figure out what to do with its most powerful weapons, Schlosser and Kenner hope to raise awareness and get people talking.

Bountiful crop ensures there'll be plenty of pumpkins this fall

BY THEOPOLIS WATERS REUTERS

CHICAGO — Halloween enthusiasts need not take fright over the state of this year's U.S. pumpkin crop. Supplies of the orange-yellow fruit are much more plentiful than last year, easing concerns of a possible shortage for carving jack-o'-lanterns and buying filling for pumpkin pies.

Store supplies of canned pumpkin have almost overcome the effects of last year's shortage, which was caused by damage to crops from heavy rains in parts of the Mid-

"We're rebuilding our inventory right now and as soon as we have enough pumpkin canned we'll begin releasing the 2016 Libby's pumpkin to our retail partners," said Roz O'Hearn, spokeswoman for Libby's, which supplies more than 80 percent of U.S. canned pumpkin. "So by end of the month, the 2015 shortage will be behind us.

For Illinois farmer Mark Berg, who grows roughly 120 acres of pumpkins for Libby's, 2016 promises to be a pumpkin-

Berg has just wrapped up his harvest ahead of schedule, averaging 30 tons of pumpkins per acre, well above his historical average of 25 tons and worth about $500 per acre.

Last year, he harvested just two to three tons per acre and revenue fell short of $100 per acre.

"You have to take the good with the bad. This year we're fortunate," Berg said, attributing his good fortune to sufficient rains and above-average heat this summer.

Pumpkins from Au Jardin are seen for sale recently at the Madawaska Farmers' Market.
