Bill Snead, Washington Post photographer, dies

BY BART BARNES
WASHINGTON POST

Bill Snead, a news photographer who spent more than two decades at The Washington Post and whose career took him from the battlefields of the Vietnam War to the front lines of refugee crises in the Balkans and the Middle East, as well as to the sleek stadiums of the NFL, died Feb. 14 at his home in Lawrence, Kansas. He was 78.

The cause was lung cancer, said his wife, Dona Snead.

Although he spent a large chunk of his professional life at The Post, serving for a time as chief of the newspaper's photo and graphics department, he also maintained strong connections to the newspaper where he began his career in 1954 as a high school senior, the Lawrence Journal-World.

In 1993, while on a sabbatical from The Post, the publisher of the Journal-World invited him to "come back home" and "run our newsroom." He was a mentor, coach and supervisor of photographers, and executive editor of the newspaper, retiring in 2007.

By that time, he had covered Super Bowls and high school sports, rodeos, graduations, political conventions and funerals. In 1992, he was a Pulitzer Prize finalist in feature photography for images he took for The Post on the plight of Kurdish refugees fleeing northern Iraq.

A 1991 photo of a young Albanian girl, wide-eyed, wistful and teary, staring through a clouded bus window during a heavy thunderstorm in Tirana, was Snead's favorite. "When I moved closer to the bus she turned away crying," he wrote, adding that he "was with a group of Westerners who were among the first foreigners allowed in the country since World War II."

Other images he highlighted on his Web page included a strip-searching of inmates at the District of Columbia Jail, a young boxer and his coach climbing into an improvised ring in Northeast Washington, a naked baby sitting on a potty in Colombia, a West Virginia snake handler with five rattlesnakes, Mother Teresa standing on a box to reach the lectern for an address in Washington, a Ku Klux Klan rally in rural Maryland, a West Virginia church revival service, and the two killers of the Clutter family in Kansas — murders that Truman Capote chronicled in his book "In Cold Blood."

Charles William Snead was born in Topeka, Kansas, on Oct. 27, 1937, and grew up in Lawrence. His father was a firefighter, and his mother was a nurse.

He was director of photography for the Wilmington (Delaware) News Journal from 1964 to 1967, when he was hired as bureau manager for the United Press International wire service in Saigon during the Vietnam War. The Delaware paper had sent him to the war zone for a brief stint in 1965. His time in Vietnam coincided with the 1968 Tet Offensive, in which tens of thousands of North Vietnamese troops attacked South Vietnamese cities and extended the war.

He was a photographer and editor at National Geographic before joining The Post in 1972 as a photographer and chief of the newspaper's photo and graphics department.

Several months before he died, Snead had known that death was imminent. Doctors had told him he did not have long to live. He told a friend, according to the Journal World, that he lived the life "of a lucky man," with "few regrets than I probably should have."

'Mob Wives' star Angela 'Big Ang' Raiola dies

Angela Raiola

BY MEREDITH BLAKE
LOS ANGELES TIMES

Reality star Angela Raiola, better known to fans of the reality series "Mob Wives" as "Big Ang," died early Thursday after a yearlong battle with cancer. She was 55.

The news was announced in a statement from a family spokesperson posted to her Twitter account.

"She was surrounded by nothing but love from her immediate family and closest friends," it read.

"YOU, (Her fans) were some of the most special people in her world, and she loved you immensely."

The towering Raiola joined "Mob Wives," a VH1 reality series documenting the lives of women with family ties to organized crime, in its second season. Though Raiola was not actually a "mob wife," her uncle, Salvatore "Sally Dogs" Lombardi, was reportedly a captain in the Genovese crime family.

Known for her flamboyant, fun-loving personality and peacemaking ways, Raiola quickly became the show's breakout star. She leveraged her popularity with viewers into two spinoffs, "Big Ang" and "Miami Monkey." Both were short-lived.

Raiola was diagnosed with throat cancer last year, and the disease later spread to her lungs and brain. In a pre-taped appearance on the syndicated talk show "Dr. Oz" that aired Tuesday, Raiola attributed her illness to a 40-year smoking habit.
