Hormone therapy; co-resident families

Q: My friend is suffering from the symptoms of menopause, but she's afraid to take hormone therapy. How can I convince her it could be beneficial? — Beth P., Charlotte, North Carolina

DOCTORS OZ AND ROIZEN

First, your friend should be examined by her gynecologist to evaluate any risk factors she may have that rule out hormone therapy — a family history of breast, ovarian or endometrial cancer, or heart disease, for example. If she gets the all-clear and is 60 or younger, then HT for less than five years can pretty safely offer relief from menopausal symptoms without increasing cancer risk significantly. Also, it reduces the risk for osteoporosis and colon cancer; and a new study shows that HT can help preserve brainpower!

In the journal Neurobiology of Aging, researchers point out that HT preserves the health of the hippocampus, the part of the brain that's responsible for memory and spatial navigation, and that may reduce the risk of dementia later in life.

We recommend using bi-identical estrogen plus micronized progesterone. (You don't need progesterone if you've had a hysterectomy.) Also, two days before starting HT, you should begin taking two low-dose aspirins (a total of 162 mg) daily with a glass of warm water before and after. Aspirin lowers the risk for clots and cancer.

Q: My son graduated from college a couple of years ago

(with $30,000 in debt), and his job started out as a minimum-wage internship. He's been living at home and doesn't seem like he's in any hurry to move out. Should I be concerned? — Liz H., Glen Cove, New York

If your son didn't have a job, was moody and sat around the house in a bathrobe watching TV, you'd have something to worry about. But your situation is becoming the new normal in the U.S. And guess what? It has important emotional and health benefits for many.

According to Pew Research, in the U.S., 32 percent of women ages 18-31 co-resided with parents, and 40 percent of young men did in 2012. Overall, a record 57 million Americans lived in multigenerational households (twice as many as in 1980). Whether it's an unexpected benefit of reduced economic mobility, a result of a divorce rate over 50 percent or high housing prices, intergenerational family support is helpful to many people.

When single parents live with their kids, it beats back loneliness, which is known to fuel depression. When costs are cut by pooling resources, kids with huge college debt, like your son, are under less stress and can make better long-term decisions. And when young children grow up in a home with a broad adult support system, it helps defuse problems and teaches them to appreciate older folks.

Grandparents, parents and their children living under the same roof is a strong tradition in many older cultures. In southern Europe — Spain and Italy, for example — up to 60 percent of adults 18-32 co-reside with parents. So as long as your son is working hard at what he wants to do, enjoy your time together.

Chess

by Shelby Lyman

Bobby Fischer was "a difficult" child, explained his mother.

Fiercely independent, he was difficult for adults who had a normal interest in shaping his world.

Fiercely competitive in sports, especially chess, he brought an aura to each game that was distinctly his.

He was not the typically talented kid, according to the Grandmaster Robert Byrne, who began play jauntily but melted before the power of grandmaster expertise.

Recalling his first game against Fischer, Byrne gives an account of a kid who kept coming at him, no matter what. There was both a degree of admiration and intimidation in Byrne's account.

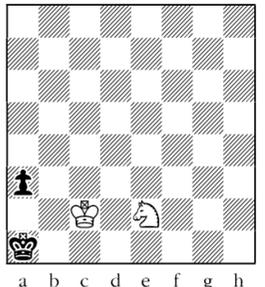

A description by Arnold Denker and Larry Parr ("The Bobby Fischer I Knew") also offers a memorable account of the young prodigy. "You could see the killer instinct in his eyes, how they flushed with anger and deep-seated hatred when he lost and how they flooded with manic glee when he won."

Only two or three such players come along in a century.

Today's Magnus Carlsen seems to share many of Bobby's traits.

He would like, he tells us in "New in Chess," to have played Fischer at his best "because the precision and energy he played with is unmatched in the history of chess."
